

Contract vs. In-House Security Services

Several organizations throughout the country routinely entrust the security of their facility, resources and assets to contract security service providers, like Thomas Protective Service, Inc. Utilizing a licensed and insured security company can save money and allows a company the opportunity to devote its attention to its principal business. Payroll taxes and associated costs have skyrocketed over the last few years as have additional areas of risk, such as workers compensation, unemployment and related litigation expenses.

A successful relationship with a licensed and insured contract security service provider is one based on mutual trust, beneficial goals, attainable expectations and continuous communication. A prominent contract security service provider will be committed and able to customize services to meet your specific needs.

It's important to note that security officers should be one part of a comprehensive protection plan rather than a stand-alone resource. Other protection resources, such as hardware and electronics, should also be considered.

In-House Security Service {Cons}

- ⇒ Liability exposure
- ⇒ Increased insurance and compensation costs
- ⇒ Increased supervision
- ⇒ Close relationship with company employees
- ⇒ Lack of flexibility in scheduling

Contract Security Service {Pros}

- ⇒ Greater control and quality of security personnel
- ⇒ Flexibility in scheduling
- ⇒ Costs include all taxes and insurance coverage
- ⇒ Specialized in scope and service
- ⇒ Possibility of collusion or fraternization detrimental to sound security is greatly diminished
- ⇒ Security personnel may be transferred or replaced upon request
